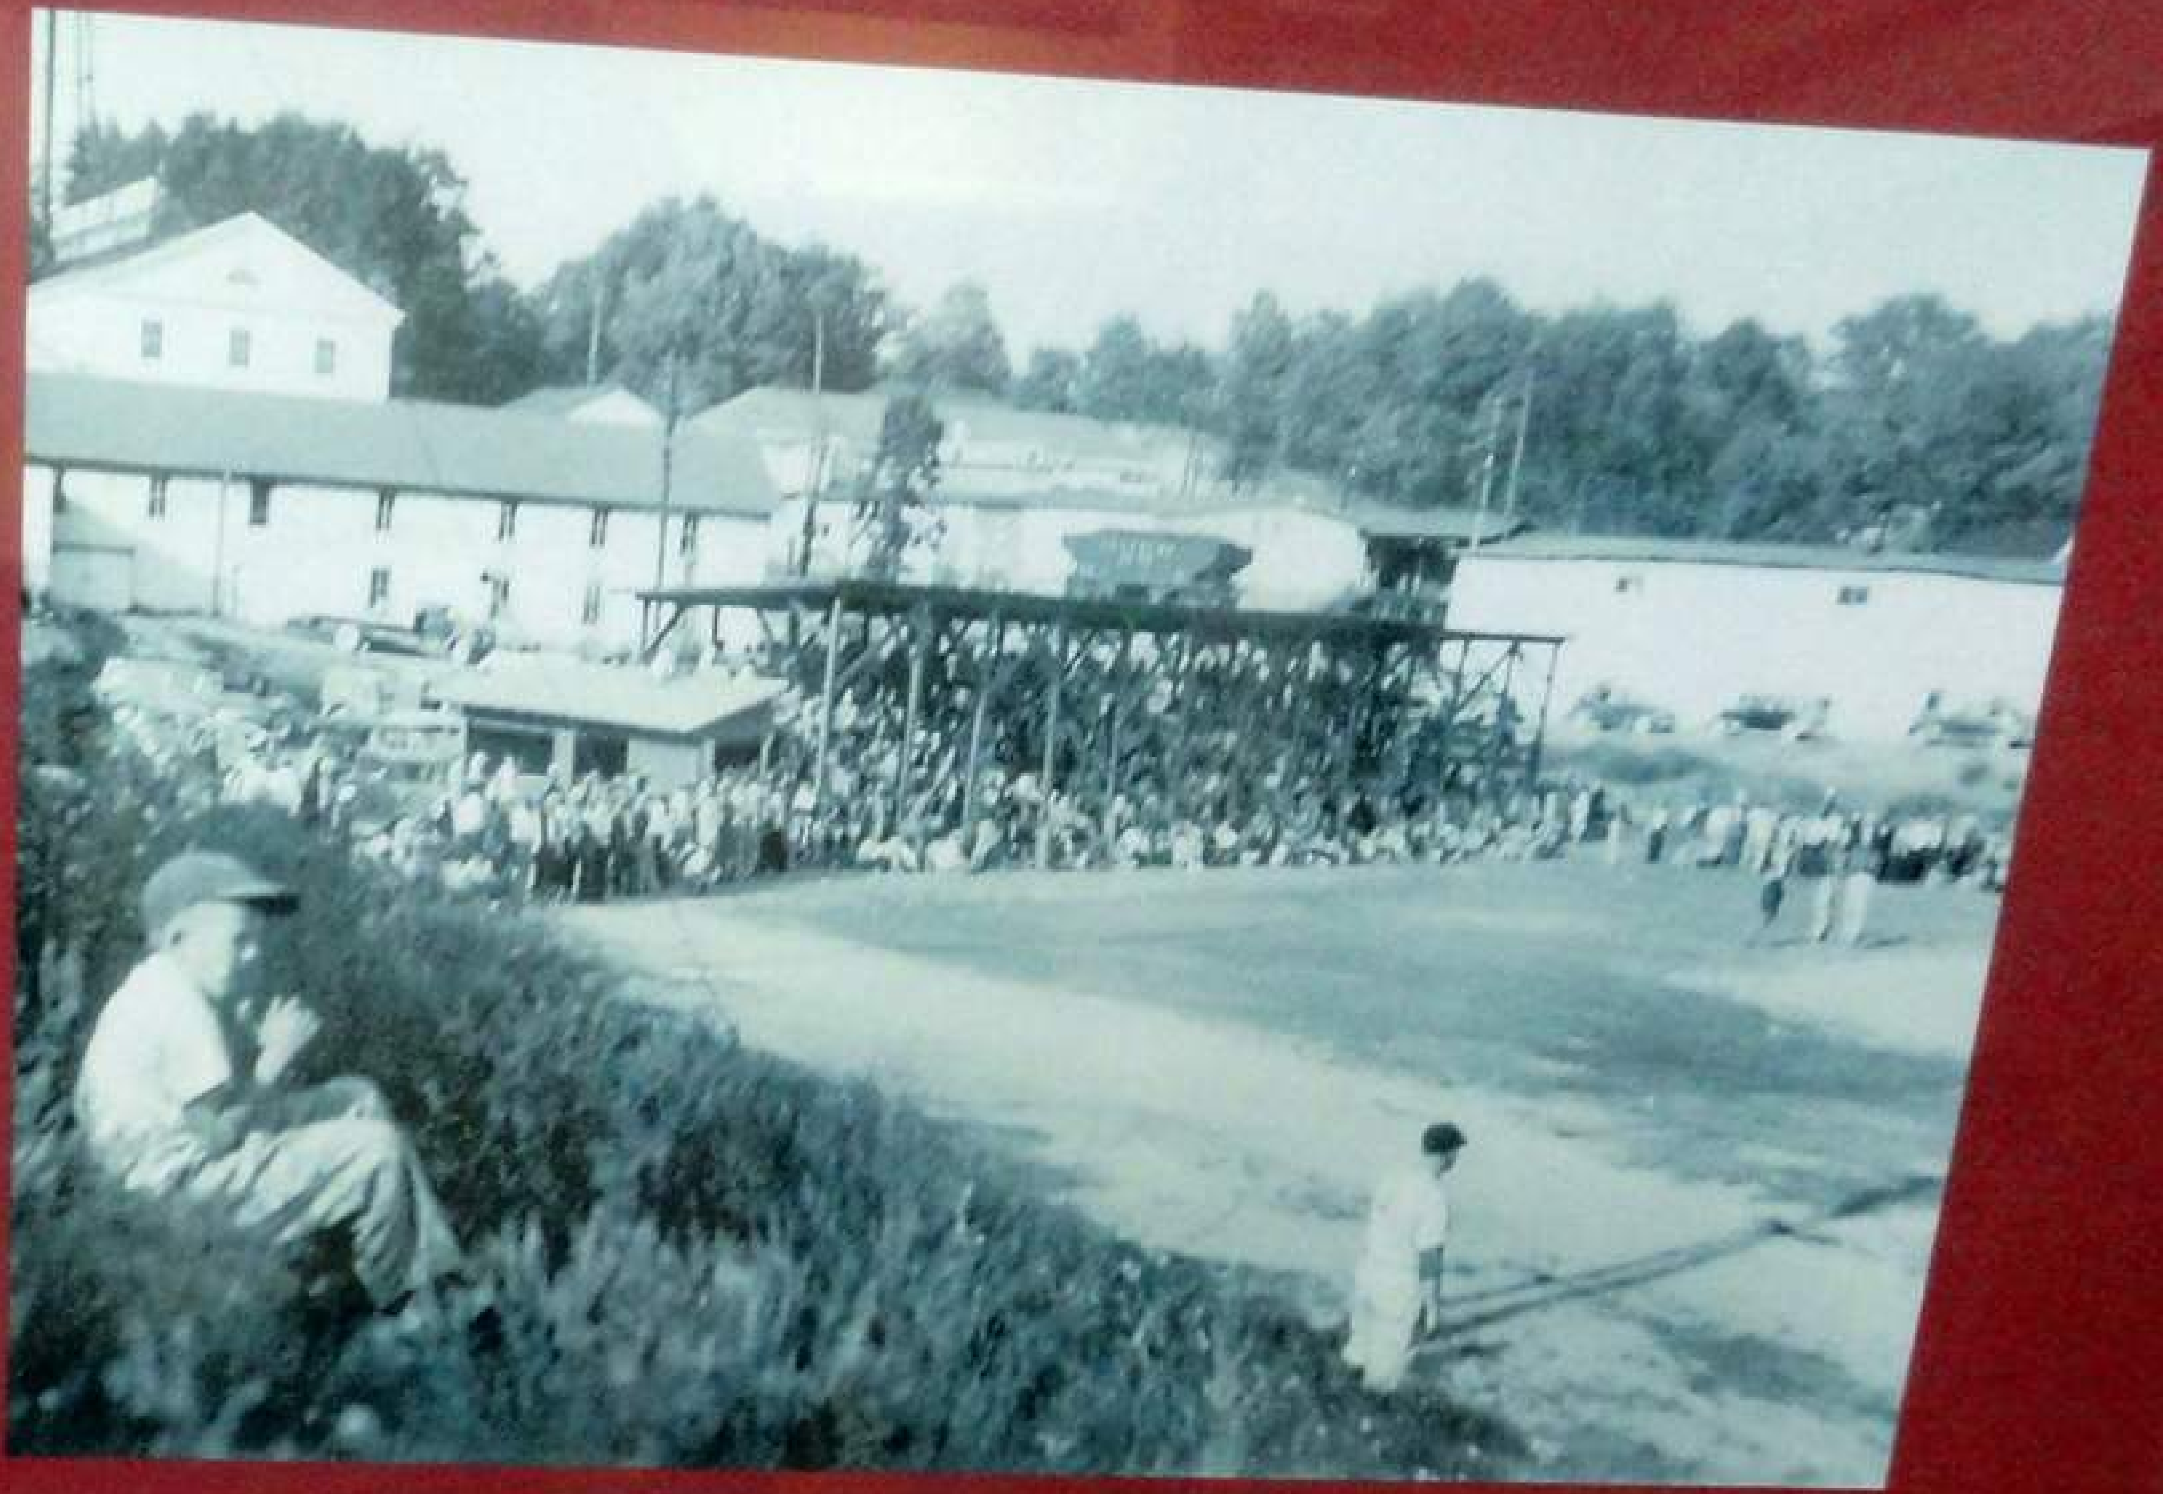
or rural families in McCreary County's early ears, community life was an important outlet for families who spent much of their time on isolated family farms. Churches and schools, in addition to their religious and educational functions, were also important social centers. Occasional trips into town provided a chance to not only stock up on needed items and take care of business, but also provided an opportunity to visit with neighbors and friends.

With the rise of the coal and logging industries, many families began to live in more densely populated coal or timber camps, or in the county's growing towns. These families welcomed an opportunity to meet and greet their neighbors. As a result large scale community and company sponsored social events began to take place.



Baseball was once a major form of entertainment in the county. Every mining camp and every town had a team.

Family is one important group to which we all belong. Community is another. Just as our families develop traditional ways of celebrating the holidays and marking special events, so do our communities.

For many McCreary Countians, community is an extension of the family bond. Many extended families are connected, if not by blood and marriage, then by long time proximity. Coming together for community events can be a lot like a family reunion

Canning. Churning. Molasses making. Egg gathering. Corn grinding. Butchering. These are just a few of the skills that once took up a significant part of the daily lives of previous generations of McCreary Countians. Producing and preparing food was difficult, time consuming, and never-ending. Today, convenient, nutritious—and some not so nutritious—foods are often just a short car ride away.

Many rural families had no choice but to be self-sufficient, and food preparation was hard work that involved the entire family. Malnutrition and poor health were not uncommon as families struggled to provide for themselves.

Today, many of us only have time to prepare foods "the old way" on special occasions. And yet, in an age of convenience, we still take time to occasionally follow older traditions. Maybe this is just nostalgia—or, perhaps it's a way to honor the hard work and self-reliance of those who came before us.

Food is such a common part of our daily life that it is easy to overlook its significance. The special foods we eat on holidays and at family celebrations are one kind of tradition. But so are the common, everyday foods that we seldom think about. Often, these foods can be just as deeply embedded in tradition and history as our "special" foods—and they can be a distinctive part of our regional heritage. Beans and cornbread, once a staple meal in mining camps and on family farms, continue to be, for many McCreary Countians, both a common meal and a regional dish. Chicken and dumplings is also an important dish for many families in our area, often served at family gatherings.

Foods themselves may be considered traditional, but so are the practices that go along with the raising, gathering, and preparation of food. Modern grocery stores and conveniences offer a whole new range of foods. And yet many of us continue some of these traditional food practices. Maybe we raise a garden, or can, freeze, or dry our produce. Others hunt, or gather traditional seasonal foodstuffs from the woods. And almost all families have special ways of

Think about the food traditions in your life. Is there a special food that the holidays just wouldn't be the same without? What new foods have become a part of your family's diet over the past few years? Do certain "comfort" foods always remind you of or many of us it is difficult to imagine everyday life as arly McCreary Countians knew it. In a time before radios, television sets and computers; before good roads and mass automobile ownership; before the peak and eventual ecline of the coal and timber industries, individuals and ilies went about the hard work of building homesteads, ising families, and establishing communities.

While so much in our lives has changed, unique local traditions remain. McCreary Countians are a diverse people — our heritage comes to us from a variety of European and Native American bloodlines and cultures. Close family ties and a love of home are sources of strength, and are traditions that help to foster a deep-rooted sense of place.

Though we may think "tradition" means "it's always been done that way," in fact, tradition is always changing. Each generation shapes the traditions that it passes on. Though some important elements remain the same, the traditions we know differ from those of our grandparents. Our children's sense of tradition will be different yet.

A rich local folklife also sets us apart. Folklife consists of arts, crafts, beliefs, customs, and other cultural expressions that are passed down informally and that are a part of all of our lives. Over time, many of these expressions become traditions, helping to define who we are and where we come from.

Looking at our folklife of yesterday and today, we see that the traditions that last are the ones that still have meaning in people's lives. Often, these traditions are meaningful because they are shared.

All around our county, there are individuals actively sharing and passing on the traditions that are important to them. Perhaps it is a story, or a particular craft, or a special food. Maybe it's an annual family gathering, or a community event, or a special song learned at church. This exhibit highlights just a few of the individuals and traditions that make up our diverse community.

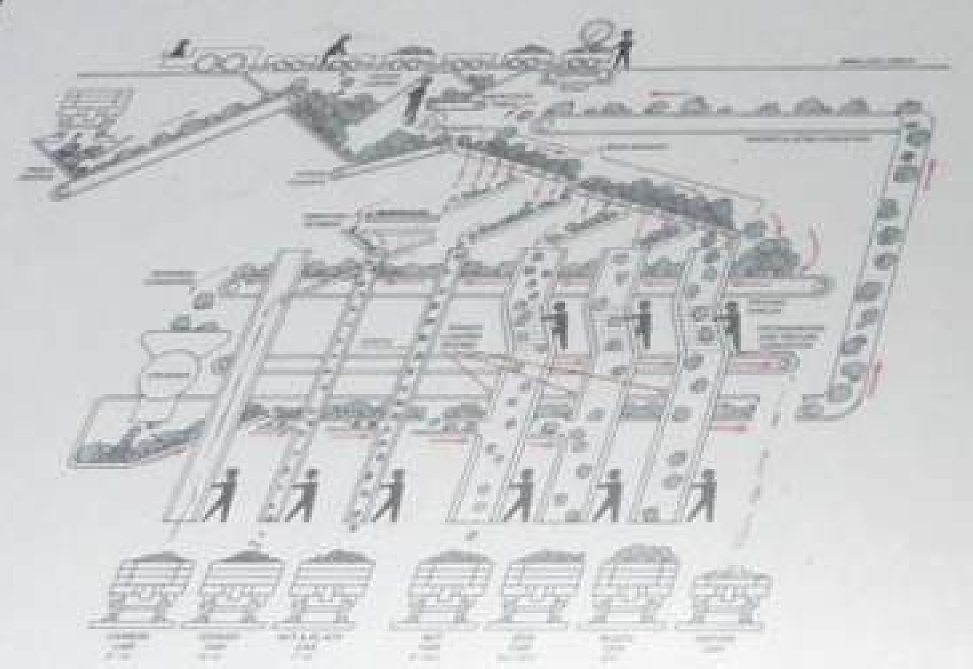
TIPPLE OPERATION



The Blue Heron Tipple was modern and mechanized for its initial operation in the late 1930's. It was publicized by the Stearns Coal and Lumber Company as having cost a quarter of a million dollars at the "New #18 Mine, Blue Heron, Kentucky."

A coal tipple separated the various sizes of coal coming from the mine in coal cars. These cars opened at the bottoms to dump coal into a main 120-ton hopper leading to a 76-foot conveyor belt called an "apron feeder." Smaller-sized coal traveled on to a series of shakers and screens that allowed coal of the right size through each screen down shoots or loading booms to coal freight cars below. Coal too large to be used domestically or commercially or to fit through one of the sizing screens, went on into a crusher. The crusher coal traveled over separate screens and on to the coal cars.

Each screen selected different size coal chunks, destined for different uses. Each of these sizes had a different name.

Main Hopper and apron feeder.

Coal too small to fit a category was called "carbon coal" and was of little use. Even when mixed with other coals for industrial use, it commanded a small price.

Rock and refuse was picked and separated out too, and being high in sulphur and impurities, could only be dumped as mine tailings or used as "ballast," or support base for rails and roads.

The Blue Heron tipple served mines and could screen, separate and load over 400 tons of coal an hour.

In those days, coal inspection was still expected to take place at the mine face, and random coal carloads were sampled as the coal came out of the mine. The Blue Heron tipple also had a smaller hopper to receive sample coal and deliver it to a conveyor inspection table where workers sorted and inspected the coal as an added insurance that quality coal would reach the market from the Blue Heron Tipple.

Other "picking tables" allowed workers to check the coal as it moved from shaker and screen to loading boom.

Loading block coal under tipple with loading booms.

Main coal shakers sort coal through holes of varying sizes.

Magnets in the stoker coal chute collected "tramp iron," keeping it from being delivered with the coal. This tramp iron consisted partially of bits that had detached from the mining machines. Retrieved by the magnets, these could be resharpened and used again, nearly paying for magnetizing the chutes.

ORAL HISTORY

Searching the public and published record for the history, lifestyles and attitudes of miners and their families at Blue Heron and other Stearns Camps yields little result.

It is typical of the history we study in schools that governments' "great" events and powerful men hold center stage. Dates of wars and elections take precedence over understanding a way of life that may pass into time unrecorded.

Oral history - in this case, the collection of peoples memories in their homes, churches, back yards and country stores - has been the main source of information for what you will read, see, and hear as you enter each open structure here at Blue Heron.

Over 40 people who taught, lived, mined, preached and visited among the Stearns camps gave generously of their time, their recollections, their attitudes and reflections so that others might know more of a way of life they shared.

The way of life of the mining camp in this century in this area of Kentucky is central to understanding economy, values, and the changes in essential characteristics of rural Kentucky society.

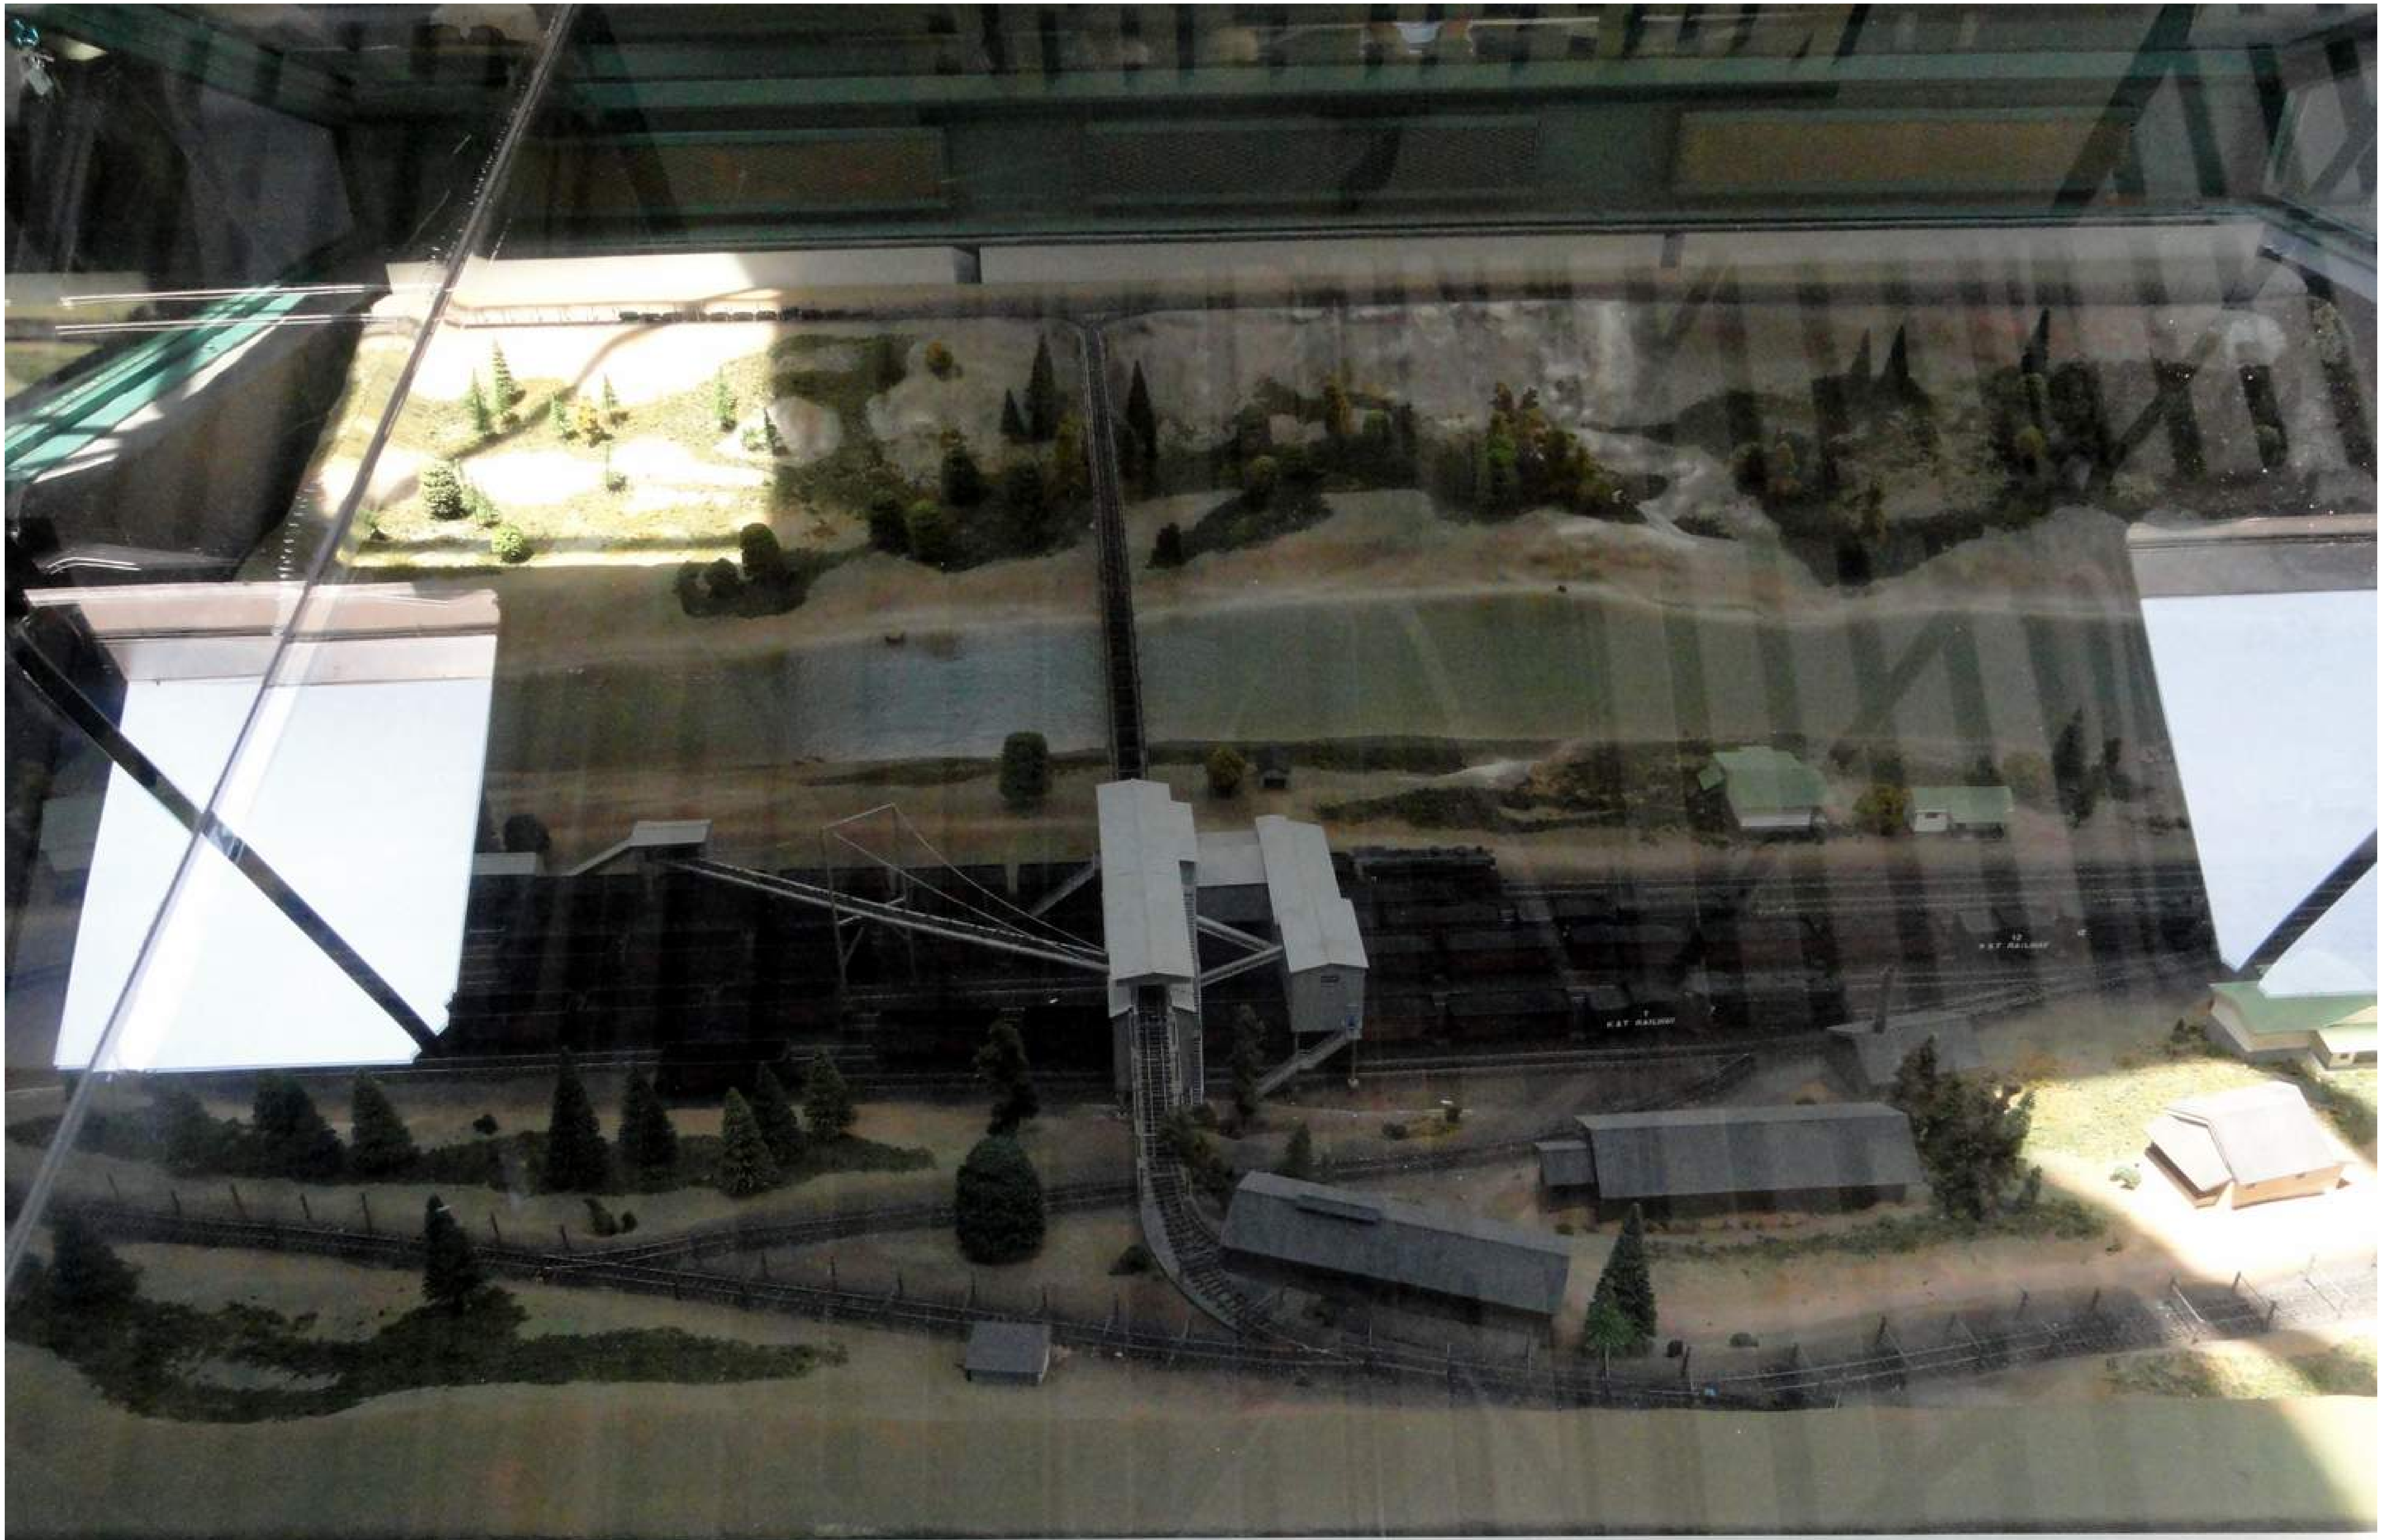
The underpinnings of great events are driven by the folk who live and work in remote areas of America. In turn, their lives are dramatically changed by national events and major shifts in economic activity.

Oral history records regional attitudes and circumstances that remain hidden from scholars depending only on the written record.

The history of Blue Heron, its people, work in the mines, family and communal life, can only be recorded through the oral recollections of those who were a part of camp life here. There is no public written record of their lives and time.

It is these people we thank, and all who come here will remember both concept and realization of this center.

A special thanks belongs to Dr. William Berge, formerly professor of Oral History at Eastern Kentucky University, who collected the memories of most of the people whose voices you will hear. From 1978 to 1986, he visited those who know about Blue Heron and became a familiar face to people who remembered life in the coal camps.



BLUE HERON COAL C

Blue Heron Camp came late to the Stearns Company operations. Settlement in this area began as a result of new mines on both sides of the river, but centered around the building of the new all-metal tipple and the tram bridge across the Big South Fork in 193

When the tipple began, there were no houses at all, and Luther Ledbetter, who

WELCOME TO BLUE HERON

Blue Heron, also called Mine 18, once employed over 200 workers and was home for nearly two dozen families. It had a school, a church, a company store and one of the largest and most up-to-date tipples of that region and time.

Today there is little left of the community once known as home and workplace to so many.

Only the ghost of the tipple that once separated, crushed and sized the coal from nearby mines remains of the original structure here.

The mines at Blue Heron held far less accessible coal than originally thought to be here. This camp, like so many others, was closed, eventually leaving only the story of the miners and their families and the beauty of the natural surroundings behind.

As you visit Blue Heron today, you will see what remains of the tipple and learn how it worked and get some notion of what mining coal here was like. The central story, however, is what it was like to live in such a place only a short time ago.

There is no written history of Blue Heron. What we know comes from the recollection of the people who lived, worked and visited here. This is their place and their story.

THE SHOP

The shop building served as a repair terminal for motors (locomotives) and tram cars. A trestle once connected the shop to the main tipple structure. The switch on this trestle could send cars to the back-up track adjacent to the shop or directly into the shop building for repair. The shop also contained a supply of spare parts for tram repair and equipment for sharpening the miners drill bits.

A KENTUCKY WILD RIVER

- Cumberland River -

IN RECOGNITION OF ITS OUTSTANDING SCENIC BEAUTY & NATURAL QUALITY, 16.1 MILES OF THE CUMBERLAND RIVER, FROM SUMMER SHOALS TO LAKE CUMBERLAND, ARE INCLUDED IN THE KENTUCKY WILD RIVERS SYSTEM.

THE WILD RIVERS SYSTEM WAS ESTABLISHED IN 1972 BY THE KENTUCKY GENERAL ASSEMBLY TO PRESERVE OUTSTANDING EXAMPLES OF KENTUCKY'S RIVER HERITAGE. IT IS ADMINISTERED BY THE KENTUCKY NATURAL RESOURCES AND ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION CABINET. DANIEL BOONE NATIONAL FOREST LANDS WITHIN THE SYSTEM ARE MANAGED BY THE U.S. FOREST SERVICE IN COOPERATION WITH THE COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY.

PLEASE HELP PROTECT THE PLANTS, WILDLIFE AND NATURAL BEAUTY OF THIS UNIQUE RIVER AREA.

THE MESSAGE IS CLEAR

Unfortunately, the wild Cumberland River has become a carrier of some of the waste that has been carelessly disposed of by Kentuckians who live upstream from Cumberland Falls.

PLEASE HELP PROTECT THE PLANTS, WILDLIFE AND NATURAL BEAUTY OF THIS UNIQUE RIVER AREA.

THE MESSAGE IS CLEAR

Unfortunately, the wild Cumberland River has become a carrier of some of the waste that has been carelessly disposed of by Kentuckians who live upstream from Cumberland Falls.

As our population increases, so does improper dumping of garbage. During floods or periods of high water, some of this garbage finds its way into the river. This can occur several times a month.

The natural currents and eddies formed around the boulders below the falls act as traps for numerous plastic containers, driftwood and other debris that are washed over the falls. As the river level goes down, an unsightly social message is left for all to see.

The message is clear--our water must be protected from the improper disposal of waste. The Kentucky State Park System makes every effort to preserve the beauty of Cumberland Falls. You can help us by encouraging people to dispose of their waste properly. In the meantime, be assured our crews will be cleaning the falls area until the rains come again.

CUMBERLAND FALLS MOONBOW

The Moonbow that appears here is the only one in the Western Hemisphere. It may be observed under a full moon and a clear sky. An arch of white light is usually produced at base of Falls and continues downstream. Generations of people have visited here to see this natural phenomenon. Last hotel on this site, Moonbow Inn, was named for the moonbow.
